

Tulane University School of Public Health and Tropical Medicine
Department of Community Health Sciences

Post Doctoral Fellow Position in Community Health Sciences

The Department of Community Health Sciences is seeking one post doctoral fellow to conduct research in community-level health promotion.

The Department has sections in Maternal & Child Health, Health Education & Communication, and Nutrition, but more broadly sees its mission as developing community-based solutions to national public health problems. We are the academic home for the DHHS-funded Tulane Xavier National Center of Excellence in Women's Health, a HRSA-funded Maternal and Child Public Health Leadership Training Program and a CDC-funded Prevention Research Center. We have very strong ties with nearby city and state public health agencies as well as community-based organizations, which provide many opportunities for research and involvement in rebuilding New Orleans post-Katrina.

The primary responsibilities for this position will be research related to community-level health promotion but may address a wide range of topics, such as physical activity, nutrition, smoking, other health-related behavior, use of mass media for health promotion and the health of women and children. The activities undertaken for this research include: literature reviews, data collection, oversight and coordination of data collection activities and interventions, data management, data analysis, preparation of research grant proposals, presentation of findings, and preparation of manuscripts. It is understood that Post-doctoral Fellowships are for 12 months, renewable at most one time for an additional 12 months. The position requires completion of a doctoral degree in a public health discipline such as maternal & child health, health education, nutrition, epidemiology, health communication, or community health sciences.

Minority applicants and women are especially welcome. Send curriculum vitae and letter stating goals for research:

Ted Chen, PhD MPH
Department of Community Health Sciences
Tulane University School of Public Health & Tropical Medicine
1440 Canal Street, Suite 2300, TW-19
New Orleans, Louisiana 70112
(504) 988-5391
tchen@tulane.edu

Tulane University is an EEO/AA employer.

Please see: www.sph.tulane.edu/chs